THE RED EAGLE:

A POEM OF THE SOUTH.

BY A B. MERK.

The leading incidents of this poem, as rounantic as they may steen, are all strictly historical. They are drawn from that remainship and sanctual sty chapter in South-westers a small known as the Creek War of 1813, which has never been depicted in such vivis colors as its interest asserves. The hero of the story is the cell-braied chieftain. Weatherfurd, or The Red Engle, as he was called by his country men.

From The Boston Peet.

"It is decidedly, may, exceedingly superir to many of the fections of the ray. There are beautiful akstebes of character throughout and indeed the book has exceeds a personage that does not make a vivid impression upon the reader. Upon the berolic the author has lark had all her powers. See is the character. The pervacing tone of thought and assumed that noble and hopeful. The conception of the whole shows a mental recent out often visible. Compared with the Lamp giver, a book that found its tens of thousands of readers, and that passes with crowds of people for an extraordinary work to this cay, Juno Clifford' will not suffer. We even think the latter shows the geims at least of a larger and higher a highly than the former.
